Tourism Development In Padang City: A Systematic Literature Review

Chandra Eka Putra

Abstract
The tourism industry is pivotal in driving regional and national economic development. It stands as one of the most reliable sources of revenue generation while also serving as a significant employer and bolstering regional investment. Governments are diligently crafting plans and policies to foster this sector's growth. One such strategy involves enhancing existing tourism offerings to attract more visitors. An extensive literature review spanning the past five years was conducted to shed light on the trajectory of tourism development in Padang. The findings reveal that tourism development in Padang has been chiefly pursued through promotional efforts on social media and the web, alongside investments in infrastructure and facilities. Furthermore, it is evident that the advancement of tourism in Padang has positively impacted social welfare and contributed to preserving environmental and cultural sustainability within the city.

INTRODUCTION

Indonesia is a nation teeming with diverse tourism offerings and rich cultural tapestries. Each region boasts an array of splendid attractions capable of captivating visitors with their sheer beauty. By harnessing its natural bounty and cultural diversity, Indonesia has the potential to transform these assets into thriving tourism destinations, enticing travelers from both domestic and international realms. Indeed, tourism has emerged as a cornerstone of the national economy, evidenced by its exponential growth in recent years. The proliferation of flight routes, the emergence of new tourist hotspots, and the expansion of accommodation options underscore the immense potential of tourism in bolstering economic prosperity. Consequently, regions that identify and leverage their tourism potential stand to reap significant financial rewards.

Tourism represents a burgeoning sector with the capacity to spur productivity across the economy, catalyzing job creation, income growth, and enhanced living standards (Pendit, 1994). Defined as journeys individuals undertake for leisure or to fulfill various desires, tourism entails planned excursions from one locale to another (Marpaung and Bahar, 2000). Ideally, national tourism development aims to augment state and societal revenues, foster employment opportunities, stimulate industrial activities, and showcase the natural and cultural splendors of the nation (Yoeti, 1996).

Tourism activities hold the potential to enrich individuals’ perspectives and experiences, offering them novel and previously unattained insights from their surroundings. The overarching aim of tourism is to foster happiness, satisfaction, knowledge acquisition, enhanced health, and physical engagement. Furthermore, tourism has transcended its erstwhile exclusivity to the affluent echelons of society, evolving into an integral facet of human existence, particularly within social and economic endeavors.
The pursuit of tourism development represents a concerted effort in developmental planning aimed at enhancing regional tourism assets and transforming them into compelling tourist attractions. Such endeavors catalyze national, regional, and community economic growth through diverse initiatives in tourism sector expansion. Moreover, non-governmental organizations leverage tourism development as a strategic tool to promote specific locales as tourist hubs, thereby bolstering trade by offering goods and services to visitors (Kania, 2013). Tourism development is at the heart of the tourism sector, necessitating collaborative efforts from all stakeholders, encompassing the community, government, businesses, and the private sector (Manurung, 2019).

Tourism development aims to enhance the appreciation of local tourism, arts, and culture while safeguarding them for posterity. This entails meticulously assessing and documenting the cultural and tourism potential, facilitating dynamic stewardship to preserve historical legacies and the integrity of artistic and cultural expressions. Achieving seamless integration across sectors necessitates collaborative efforts from all stakeholders, encompassing the community and governmental bodies. Constructing new tourist attractions or revitalizing existing ones represent viable avenues for fostering tourism industry growth. When executed with precision, tourism holds immense potential to catalyze economic advancement, fostering a balanced and sustainable development trajectory that empowers the local environment to bolster societal progress with a focus on fostering a creative and innovative economy.

The rapid expansion of tourism can yield a plethora of ramifications. As underscored by (Spillane, 1989), the impacts stemming from tourism development are multifaceted, encompassing both positive and negative dimensions. Positive outcomes include job creation, expanded business opportunities, augmented incomes, cultural preservation, and heightened cultural exchange between tourists and local communities. Conversely, negative repercussions may encompass heightened population pressures from external influxes, the encroachment of commercialization, the proliferation of consumptive lifestyles, environmental degradation, dwindling agricultural land availability, cultural homogenization, and the imperilment of local identities. Additionally, tourism sector development invariably engenders transformative changes within areas or regions, influencing economic dynamics and augmenting livelihoods for select segments of the local populace (Biddulph, 2015).

Regional tourism development necessitates cultivating human resources endowed with requisite competencies, enabling them to continually evolve and possess adept capabilities to confront the challenges of globalization. Within organizations, human resources (HR) must embody the requisite competencies to ensure the sustained vitality and progress of the organization. Hence, effective management is imperative for organizations to actualize their objectives. Tourism development initiatives have been underway across various regions, with West Sumatra emerging as a prominent candidate endowed with substantial tourism potential. Geographically, this region harbors the inherent capacity to be transformed into a natural and cultural tourism hub, owing to its diverse landscape characterized by the Bukit Barisan range’s mountainous terrain and the Melintang Fault’s geological features. Moreover, West Sumatra boasts a plethora of natural wonders, including valleys, towering peaks, cascading waterfalls, pristine lakes, natural caverns, and assorted geological phenomena dispersed across its expanse. Padang stands out as a magnet for visitors among the locales within West Sumatra, exhibiting significant tourism potential.

Padang, situated within West Sumatra, has untapped tourism potential. The city offers a plethora of captivating attractions suitable for family visits. Tourist destinations in Padang encompass a diverse array, ranging from nature-based wonders to cultural landmarks. Moreover, being directly adjacent to the sea, Padang boasts numerous pristine beaches that allure visitors with their natural splendor. However, despite the popularity of certain tourist spots in recent years, Padang has encountered significant challenges, including dwindling visitor numbers during peak seasons and a noticeable lack of upkeep and development of its inherent potential. Evident signs of this issue manifest in the deterioration and neglect of coastal areas, which serve as the primary draw for tourists, alongside the inadequate provision of supporting facilities for tourist enjoyment. Given the realities above, a comprehensive literature review becomes imperative to glean insights pertinent to the research endeavor, aiming to elucidate the trajectory of tourism development in Kota Padang. The focal point of this literature review pertains to scrutinizing published articles concerning tourism development in Kota Padang, facilitating a deeper understanding of the subject matter.
LITERATURE REVIEW

The Concept of Tourism

Tourism entails engaging in recreational activities at destinations distinct from one’s routine environment. It constitutes a temporary pause driven by a desire for enjoyment and entertainment rather than an endeavor to earn a livelihood. (Wenas and Seska, 2021) define tourism as a journey undertaken for leisure or vacation purposes, encompassing the requisite preparations for such excursions. Additionally, as posited by (Sari et al., 2021), tourism involves temporarily relocating from one’s habitual residence, motivated by non-economic motives. Thus, individuals embark on travels seeking gratification through entertainment or sheer pleasure.

Following Law No. 10 of 2009 on Tourism, Article 1, Paragraph 3, tourism encompasses a spectrum of activities facilitated by community, entrepreneurial, governmental, and local governmental contributions. This includes developing tourist sites, attractions, and ancillary enterprises associated with the tourism sector. The focal point of tourism is the target destination or attraction (Marsono et al., 2016). Collectively, these definitions elucidate tourism as a realm of activities centered around recreational travel aimed at seeking entertainment, relaxation, and a change of environment. Such activities typically transpire outside one’s habitual surroundings and are temporary. Moreover, the tourism sector entails the provision of requisite amenities, facilities, and infrastructure to cater to the needs of travelers.

The Concept of Tourism Development

Tourism development encompasses endeavors to foster a harmonious amalgamation of various resources, both within and beyond the realm of tourism, to propel the growth of tourism activities (Fenriza, 2017). Additionally, (Heryati, 2018) posits that tourism development fundamentally entails enhancing and refining existing assets. It entails constructing, upkeep, and preserving attractions, facilities, infrastructure, and ancillary amenities. Fandeli, as cited in (Heryati, 2018), elucidates that tourism development is essentially geared towards community and regional advancement by 1) Enhancing community livelihoods while safeguarding local identities and traditions, 2) Augmenting economic prosperity with equitable distribution among residents, and 3) Emphasizing the cultivation of small and medium-scale tourism endeavors with extensive employment opportunities, underpinned by cooperative technologies. The optimal utilization of tourism as a conduit for preserving cultural heritage while mitigating adverse impacts is underscored.

Several pivotal components in tourism contribute to the development process, bifurcated into the supply and demand aspects. As delineated by (Mamarodia, 2015), these include attractions, serving as the primary draw of a destination; accessibility, about the infrastructure facilitating access to the destination; amenities, encompassing facilities catering to tourists’ needs and desires; and ancillary services, involving organizations and institutions overseeing tourist destinations. In essence, tourism development epitomizes an endeavor to enhance and elevate the appeal of destinations, fostering heightened enjoyment and satisfaction among visitors and enticing them to explore and experience the offerings.

METHODS

The author conducted a comprehensive literature review encompassing several journal articles to compile this scientific paper. This review analyzes the development of tourism in Padang City. The data utilized in the literature review were sourced from various scientific journals aligned with the research variables. Research references and data were gathered through digital searches using platforms such as Google Scholar, Science Direct, Research Gate, and Open Journal Access. Keyword searches were employed to streamline the search process. Specifically, data from 2015 to 2021 were prioritized, while information from textbooks or literature books was not restricted by publication year.

RESULT

Following an exhaustive literature search on platforms including Research Gate and Open Journal Access, 15 articles were identified, meeting the requisite criteria focusing on tourism development, particularly in Padang, West Sumatra. The systematic literature review yielded the following research articles.

Based on Table 1, 15 research articles provide insights into tourism development in Padang. Among these, seven articles delve into various aspects of tourism development, while 1 article focuses on tourism development planning tailored explicitly to Padang. Additionally, three articles expound upon tourism development strategies pertinent to Padang, while another article scrutinizes internal and external factors influencing tourism development in the city. Moreover, there is 1 article dedicated to elucidating the role of the government in Padang’s tourism development, alongside two articles exploring the impact of tourism development on the city.

According to the research conducted by (Yanti, 2022), collaborative efforts between the Padang city government and the tourism office persist in revitalizing five selected tourist attractions, leveraging promotional campaigns via social media and the web. On the other hand, the (Putri, 2022) findings suggest that the trajectory of tourism development in Padang City portends a promising trend, supported by compelling rationales, potentially augmenting regional income through mechanisms such as Hotel Tax and Restaurant Tax and stimulating economic activities within urban spheres. A separate study addressing tourism development programs (Umar, 2018) underscores the prioritization of beach attractions in Muaro Lasak for development, with Muaro Anai beach attractions ranked lower in priority. Similarly, (Yusri, 2019) emphasizes Bungus Beach as the focal point for tourist attraction development, exhibiting a higher prioritization weight compared to alternative options like Nirwana Beach and Pasir Jambak Beach.

Meanwhile, (Ruspianda, 2019) delineates the Padang City Government’s initiatives in the tourism development sector, encompassing 1) Enhancements to the integrated tourist destination of Mount Padang; 2) Cultural preservation efforts involving the mobilization of Minang cultural art studios, Nagari children’s games, and Minang art-based events; and 3) Strengthened partnerships and collaborations with various stakeholders. Additionally, research (Putra, 2021) underscores the necessity for enhanced supervision, security, and development at Muaro Lasak Beach, a prominent tourist attraction in Padang City. In another vein, (Riski, 2016) examines tourism development strategies, advocating for the utilization of existing tourism potentials, such as local cultural uniqueness, marine tourism opportunities, and the engagement of relevant business.
Tourism development constitutes a process aimed at cultural, historical, and economic considerations and environmental organizations, emphasizing external cultures may strain social dynamics within the community. The tourism sector’s endeavors have facilitated job creation, income generation, and educational advantages within the vicinity of tourist attractions, spanning roles such as hospitality staff, janitorial services, island apparel and food vendors, and transportation providers, among others. However, alongside these benefits, development initiatives have also brought forth negative consequences, including infiltrating undesirable behaviors into the local environment. For instance, the attire of island climbers and tourists may disregard local norms, resulting in environmental degradation through littering and neglect of cleanliness standards. Moreover, the influx of external cultures may strain social dynamics within the community, particularly in employment.

Furthermore, effective tourism development necessitates strategic intervention by local governments. The government is pivotal in tourism planning, development, policy formulation, and regulatory frameworks (Afandi, 2017). One viable strategy entails proactive promotion efforts (Suwantoro, 1997), complemented by investments in essential facilities and infrastructure to enhance the tourism experience (Suwantoro, 1997). In light of the preceding, successful tourism development is gauged by its contributions to social welfare, exemplified by job creation, income augmentation, and educational advancements. Additionally, it should manifest in preserving and enhancing environmental and cultural sustainability, safeguarding community traditions and ecological integrity.

CONCLUSION

Based on the insights gleaned from the reviewed literature, several noteworthy conclusions regarding tourism development in Padang City can be drawn. Firstly, tourism development initiatives in Padang City have been actively pursued through multifaceted approaches, including robust promotional campaigns on social media platforms and the web. Additionally, concerted efforts have been made to enhance tourism infrastructure and facilities to cater to the burgeoning tourist influx.

Secondly, the impact of tourism development extends beyond mere economic gains, as evidenced by its positive contributions to social welfare and the preservation of environmental and cultural integrity within Padang City. The tourism sector’s endeavors have facilitated job creation, income generation, and educational opportunities at the Gunung Padang cultural heritage site. These strategies encompass the development of tourist facilities and infrastructure, optimizing service systems, optimizing cultural heritage preservation protocols, and enhancing promotional media.

Research about the impact of tourism development (Amanda, 2021) underscores both the positive and negative ramifications of island tourist attraction development. Positive effects include job creation, augmented regional income, and educational advancements. Conversely, adverse outcomes entail the infiltration of foreign cultures, ecosystem degradation on islands, and disrupted social dynamics among island communities. Similarly, (Anggraini, 2020) delves into the multifaceted impact of tourist attraction development on fishing communities’ social, economic, and cultural aspects along the Banana River in Padang City. Notably, increased educational opportunities for fishermen’s children correlate with improved welfare within the fishing community. Drawing from the literature review, the development of tourism in Padang City is pivotal in advancing the region’s tourism endeavors. Tourism development constitutes a process aimed at enhancing existing assets, encompassing the construction, maintenance, and preservation of attractions, facilities, and infrastructure (Heryati, 2018). Moreover, it serves as a strategic initiative to elevate the condition of tourist destinations, ensuring continuous improvement and refinement (Paturusi, 2001). Additionally, tourism development yields benefits for various stakeholders, including local governments, surrounding communities, and managing organizations, emphasizing cultural, historical, and economic considerations (Mill, 2000).

Tourism development emerges as a critical strategy for bolstering regional economic growth and amplifying opportunities within the tourism industry (Zhang, 2013). A comprehensive approach to tourism development is essential, aiming to optimize benefits across economic, social, and cultural dimensions (Spillane, 2000). The direct impact of tourism development on communities encompasses both positive and negative aspects, with economic benefits evident in the form of increased business and job opportunities, as well as heightened national income. However, negative repercussions such as social transformations and environmental degradation also warrant attention (Yoeti, 2008).

The development of tourist attractions in Padang City has profoundly impacted the local community. Positively, it has spurred job creation opportunities within the vicinity of tourist attractions, spanning roles such as hospitality staff, janitorial services, island apparel and food vendors, and transportation providers, among others. However, alongside these benefits, development initiatives have also brought forth negative consequences, including infiltrating undesirable behaviors into the local environment. For instance, the attire of island climbers and tourists may disregard local norms, resulting in environmental degradation through littering and neglect of cleanliness standards. Moreover, the influx of external cultures may strain social dynamics within the community, particularly in employment. advancements, fostering greater well-being among local communities. Furthermore, measures implemented to ensure the sustainability of natural resources and cultural heritage underscore the commitment to long-term ecological and cultural stewardship.

In essence, the comprehensive development of tourism in Padang City bolsters its economic vibrancy and enhances its inhabitants’ overall quality of life while safeguarding the city’s rich environmental and cultural heritage for future generations.
